Nor is the success of those colleges which employ numerous tutors any recommendation of the system. It is a fact confessed by hundreds of students from the New England Colleges, as we have it on the authority of Prof. Stuart of Andover, that they were worse classical scholars when they left college than when they entered it, & this notwithstanding that Barnard, the Tutors there employed, are older & more experienced than any we can get.

7. These things being so, it is respectfully submitted to the Trustees, whether something ought not to be done to remedy this crying grievance. Why is all expenditure & all efficient tuition lavished on the two upper classes? Why are classics admitted to such a conspicuous rank in the scheme of education, if any accidental teacher, who may be employed for a year or six months is adequate to instruct in them? ~~It is proposed to~~ According to present arrangements, the two upper classes will have the monopoly of six professors, with the exception that if a Prof. of Rhetoric is appointed, he will give some lessons to the Sophomore Class. The late professorship endowed is an adjunct to the mathematical Department. Why should not the classical Department have an adjunct? Altho' it will not be denied that the Professorship of Rhetoric is wanted to complete the establishment, yet the writer of this Report was once induced to relinquish that station, & accept his present one because the former was not thought indispensable. It is his decided opinion that among the Professors now in existence, the duties of the Professorship of Rhetoric might be partially fulfilled & that the new Professor about to be appointed, ought to be assigned to the Department of Language, either as adjunct in the Latin & Greek or as Prof. of one of those Languages, solely. This is not singular. The writer knows it to be the case in several of the first colleges in the Union.

If the Committee refuse this, will they not at least assign to the new Professor a portion of the classical tuition?

If they think that their powers do not reach to a provision against the evil herein complained of, will they bear
